Measures for the Protection of Complainants, Whistleblowers, Witnesses, and the Safeguarding of Confidentiality

1. Confidentiality and Protection during Complaint Proceedings In the consideration of complaints, appropriate levels of confidentiality shall be applied, and all relevant parties shall be afforded protection in accordance with the Regulation on the Security of Official Information, B.E. 2544 (2001). When forwarding such matters to the relevant agencies for further consideration, informants and complainants may potentially be subjected to hardship. In cases involving preliminary accusations against government officials, such matters shall be deemed classified official information. For anonymous complaints, only those that provide supporting evidence, present clearly identifiable surrounding circumstances, or specify credible witnesses shall be taken into consideration. In cases involving allegations against influential individuals, the identity and address of the complainant must be strictly withheld. Where it is not possible to maintain anonymity, the relevant agency shall be informed and must implement protective measures for the complainant, as follows: “The superior officer shall exercise discretion and issue appropriate orders to ensure the protection of complainants, witnesses, and informants involved in investigative procedures, so as to prevent them from suffering any harm or injustice as a result of the complaint, testimony, or the provision of information.” If the complaint includes the identity of the accused, protective measures must be extended to both the complainant and the accused, as the allegations have yet to be substantiated and may be the result of malicious intent. Furthermore, if the complainant explicitly requests that their identity not be disclosed, the responsible agency must refrain from revealing such information to the agency or individual under complaint, as disclosure may result in adverse consequences for the complainant.

2.Non-retaliation and Safeguards for Employment and Well-being Complainants and witnesses shall not be subjected to any punitive or adverse actions affecting their employment status or personal livelihood as a result of lodging a complaint. Should any administrative measures be deemed necessary—such as the temporary reassignment of the workplace to prevent interaction between the complainant, witnesses, and the accused—such actions shall only be undertaken with the explicit consent of the complainant and witnesses.

3.Consideration of Requests from Affected Parties Requests submitted by victims, complainants, or witnesses—such as the request for workplace relocation or other protective or remedial measures—shall be duly considered by the designated authorities or responsible personnel, based on appropriateness and necessity.

4.Protection Against Retaliation Measures shall be implemented to ensure that complainants are protected from any form of retaliation, harassment, or unjust treatment stemming from their act of complaint submission.
